To Whom It May Concern:

I am a UC Berkeley graduate with a background in research, editorial production, and data infrastructure. I studied History and Public Policy, graduating in May 2026 with a 3.7 GPA. My thesis, as presented to the UC Berkeley's History Department, studied the change in industrial production in the Bay Area during the late 1970s and early 1980s. It looked at the anticipations of technical automation and the consequences it had on Bay Area quality of life.

For the past year, I served as Editor-in-Chief of the Berkeley Political Review, managing daily publication across a staff of over a hundred writers, editors, and designers. I set editorial priorities, coordinated production timelines, and oversaw quality across a high-volume operation. During my tenure, readership grew from fewer than 50 daily readers to over 400. Before that, I spent two years as a section editor supervising fifteen writers, developing story ideas, and taking pieces from pitch to publication. I know how to manage people, meet deadlines, and maintain standards under pressure.

Outside the newsroom, I have built technical infrastructure for tracking and interpreting public information. I developed an automated platform that aggregates municipal and legislative data through live pipelines, with a public-facing dashboard updated daily. The project required designing data collection systems, writing deployment automation, and presenting complex information in an accessible format. The goal was to make public information actually public — accessible to journalists, researchers, and general readers alike.

I also bring direct policy experience. As a fellow for a Berkeley City Council district, I produced data-driven recommendations on transportation infrastructure that are currently in use. Earlier, I contributed to the drafting of California Senate Bill 793, which banned the sale of flavored nicotine products statewide. I understand how policy is made and how it lands on the people it affects.

I am a fluent Spanish speaker and have experience working across government, nonprofit, and media environments. I am a careful writer, a fast learner, and a reliable executor under deadline.

Best,

Elias Myers
